"This Lost Hunters: A Take of Eastly Times. By John T. Adams. New York: M. Doolady. This is a well-written romance of the early times of New-England history. The aristocracy of a small fown in the interfor, the remnants of the Indian tribes which for a while lingered about the settlements, the diant ribes which for a while lingered about the settlements, the last of the household blacks, slaves in name but masters in reality, are well described. The plot of the story is not very deep, and the reader fancies he sees through it long before the eyes of the actors in it are opened; but it serves to develop powerful and agreeable characters, young and old, and is illustrated with pleasant pictures of old-fashioned life and manners. It compares very well with some of Cooper's earlier romances, and has some quite striking scenes and incidents, which are very well wrought up and described."

Headaches is the favorite sign by which nature makes known any deviation whatever from the natural state of the brain, and viewed in the light it may be looked on as a safeguard, intended to give notice of disease which might otherwise scape attention, till too late to be remedied; and its indications should never be neglected. Headaches may be classified under two names, viz: Symptomatic and didopathin. Symptomatic two names, viz: Symptomatic and didopathin. Symptomatic two names, viz: Symptomatic and lidopathin.
